Chief Guest Mr. Shashi Shekhar Vempati addressing the audience during 67th Teachers' Day

In his welcome speech, Prof. Kedare congratulating the awardees said, "A teacher has an important role in society. An excellent teacher encourages students to learn and grow. Students, therefore, have a very important role in a teacher's development. It may not be an exaggeration to say that a student makes a teacher 'a teacher' and perhaps a good student makes a teacher 'an excellent one!'"

During his speech, Chief Guest Mr. Vempati shared, "It is always a deeply humbling experience to return to IIT Bombay, which for every alumnus feels like coming back home. The four years we spent here not only shaped our careers but also instilled in us the confidence to face challenges and explore uncharted paths in life. Today, as we celebrate excellence in teaching, research and innovation, I see IIT Bombay playing an even greater role in attracting talent back to India, as a hub for cutting-edge ideas and as a premier Institution advancing the nation's vision for 2047. Thanks to the dedication of its faculty, IIT Bombay continues to inspire and nurture generations of students who will lead India's growth story. Researchers Develop A Smart Irrigation Plan To Save 10-30% Of Irrigation Water In Drought-Prone Regions

Researchers combine weather forecasts, satellite soil moisture data, and a computer simulation for efficient irrigation water management at district and sub-district scales.

Both water and money need to be managed wisely. When money in the bank is limited, people spend it prudently. Farmers in a drought-prone area face a similar situation with water. Daily, they must plan for irrigation. The rains are unpredictable, and they can't waste the already diminishing groundwater. If farmers know beforehand how much water they will receive through rainfall in the coming weeks, they can plan their irrigation wisely, helping crop growth and conserving groundwater at the same time.

Researchers from the Department of Civil Engineering and Centre for Climate Studies at the Indian Institute of Technology Bombay (IIT Bombay) and the Indian Institute of Tropical Meteorology, Pune (IITM Pune), have developed a method that addresses the same issue. In their recent study, they combined extended-range weather forecasts (1 to 3 weeks ahead), generated by IITM, Pune, satellite soil moisture data processed by IIT Bombay, and a computer model, to predict the amount of irrigation water needed up to three weeks, on a district and sub-district scale.

Earlier, during their pilot study in Nashik, Maharashtra, the researchers found that some well-to-do grape farmers used local soil moisture sensors. If the soil moisture sensor detects soil dryness, the farmers irrigate the grape farms. If the irrigated grape farms receive rainfall, the irrigation water gets wasted. To avoid water wastage in already shrinking groundwater locations, the authors suggested including weather forecasts.

"During our pilot study in Nashik, we included local weather forecasts in the soil moisture data and showed farmers that groundwater can be conserved up to 30 %. We initially predicted up to one week (short-range) ahead," shares Prof. Subimal Ghosh, from IIT Bombay.

During this short-range prediction, researchers fed weather forecast and soil moisture data into a computer model that checks the possible amount of rain, the water capacity of the soil and the water requirements of each crop. The computer model provides details on when and how much water would be needed for the crops. If the model predicts no rainfall in the coming days, it will suggest irrigating crops

now. On the other hand, if the model predicts rainfall that can increase the soil moisture, it might suggest avoiding irrigating crops. Their findings showed that the grape farms could consume 10 to 30 % less water without compromising the yield. This approach prevents overwatering the crops and saves water.

The team extended their methodology in 12 sub-districts of Bankura, a drought-prone district in West Bengal. They considered five major crop varieties, i.e. maize, wheat, sunflower, groundnut, and sugarcane, a combination of cereals, oil seeds and cash crops. These widely grown crops have varied growth patterns and water requirements. Each crop variety has a varied root zone depth, the extent below the soil surface to which a crop's roots reach for water and nutrients. It is essential to retain soil wetness up to this level. When plants do not get enough water, they sense the water stress. To conserve water, they close stomata, the tiny pores on the leaf surface, meant for the exchange of gases.

The researchers used global soil maps and integrated satellite and field data to include soil moisture data such as root zone depth, soil texture, porosity, water-holding capacity, water conductivity and stomatal closure. The researchers collected water consumption, monthly rainfall, root depth, and irrigation water requirement data from the Food and Agriculture Organisation (FAO) resource, IMD database and IITM Pune.

"Our computer model depicts the natural process by which plants draw water from the soil, their adaptation during a water stress, and their response during a water balance after irrigation or rainfall," says Prof. Ghosh.

The study methodology acted as a real-time advisor for water management. The researchers used the computer model and validated it with actual soil, weather, and crop requirements data for all the crops for the upcoming three weeks. By implementing this plan, the crops can consume less than 10 to 30% of the water usage compared to the traditional irrigation methods across all 12 sub-districts.

"We did not want to make the model very crop-specific, so we have developed more generalised equations. We used a very simple ecohydrological model that employed weather forecasts and soil moisture data, which can be adjusted based on the region and crops," adds Prof. Ghosh.

The extended-range weather forecasts can help in forecasting district-level water requirements and can assist water management. With the possibility of replicating across wide crop varieties and soil types, the approach aids in efficient water usage. "To expand this effort to other districts, we must convince the farmers that the model is beneficial. We are planning to discuss with farmers in villages to install a few sensors and develop an advisory system," shares Prof. Ghosh.

The study highlights how weather forecasting, remote sensing, and computer simulation can be joined together to assist farmers and water managers in effective irrigation management and reduce groundwater dependency.
